All it has done is turn it into another public commodity, to be exploited and trivialised on the one hand and, on the other, codified in ways that make its various forms easier to identify and repress. Oh, for just one desire now that dare not speak its name.

What Freud did, with his extraordinary imagination and his genius for self-promotion, was establish one of the two pseudo-sciences (the other is economics) to which we are all enslaved. Posterity, surely, will be amazed that a culture that has identified DNA can also speak of the Super-Ego; that its members willingly put themselves into the hands of experts in mumbo-jumbo who, with their rival certainties, advise and direct and assess and manipulate every area of our lives, including our working lives and the nurturing and education of our children.

Listen to the jargon in which people now analyse themselves and one another. This, in the end, is what Freud's "talking cure" has brought us to, a knowing and trivial discourse as esoteric and meaningless, in its
